Performance of "Tristan foolde" Under Difficulties,

The first performance of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" in the orseent season took place at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening. Probably many persons wondered why such a sattletic tragedy was selected for the sve of Christmas. Certainly there is nothing in the work to accord with the spirit of the greatest Christian festival. But impresarios cannot always select music appropriate to times and occasions.

Dancing.

Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs gave the largest party of last night at her home, 1 East
Entry-seventh street, for her many friends who happened to be passing the holiday a town. The entire house was decorated with Christmas greens and in the drawing room was a huge Christmas tree on which were hung souvenirs for all the guests. There were carols by a band of choristers.

There was dancing and a continuous trees are respected to the statement that Mr. Urlus was the restrict to the party of the best loved works in the lyric repertory. It was therefore given without doubt as a strong attraction in the hope that its potent spell might serve to exorcise the demon of gloom which often sits solitary in a place of amusement on the night before Christmas. Too frequently, indeed, is it true that not another creature is stirring all through the house. Unfortunately the performance was carried to its conclusion under no small difficulty. Mr. Urlus was the centre of disturbance, as he was on the occasion of his debut here, which was effected in the same role. He was then a victim of loss of voice, but last night he was attacked by acute indigestion. After the second act an announcement of the facts was made by William Guard of the house staff, coupled with the statement that Mr. Urlus would endeavor to complete the performance.

ALBERT JAMES.

Albert James came to this country with Agnes Huntington (Mrs. Paul Cravath) when she made her successful tour here with Planquettes "Paul Jones." He had previously sung in this operetta at the Savoy Theatre. He began at the Globe Theatre in London in 1868 as a callboy there and made his debut somewhat later in "Cyril's Success." In all his appearances it was his skill as a low comedian that brought him success. He acted in "Marjorie" and other comic operas and also played the buffo roles in the performances of the Carl Rosa Opera Company.
